

Overview

Chulu Far East Peak is an enthralling and adventurous trekking peak in Nepal, standing at 6,060 meters (19,882 ft) above sea level. It is located in the northeast of the Annapurna Himalayan range, within the Damodar Himalaya range and near the village of Manang. The first ascent of Chulu Far East Peak was made on April 22, 1955, by a German expedition led by Harald Biller. The team members who reached the summit were Franz J. Dengler, Adolf Diemberger, Hans J. Ertl, Jürgen Wellenkamp, and a Nepali Sherpa guide.

The climbing trip begins with a long and scenic bus ride from Kathmandu to Chame, via the busy Prithvi Highway and the Annapurna Classic Trail to Manang. To reach Chulu Far East Peak base camp, the trail passes through the captivating Marsyangdi River Valley, which includes eye-catching terraced rice fields, numerous villages, crystal-clear perennial rivers, summer grazing lands for yaks and horses, ancient Tibetan villages, tea houses, spiritual Hindu temples, gompas, and mane walls.

The peak itself is moderately difficult to climb, with 75 to 85-degree ice and snow slopes and crevasses. Climbing equipment required includes fixed line ropes, Jumars (ascender devices), ATC guides or Figure 8s (belay devices), crampons, harnesses, regular ice axes, helmets, carabiners, and safety ropes. Novice climbers can also make it with the support of fixed line ropes, while skilled climbers may not need support on the slopes.

The climbing route to Chulu Far East Peak follows the normal route, the northeast ridge, with full support of fixed ropes for safety. It is quite challenging for beginner climbers, but with proper preparation and the support of an experienced, skilled, and trustworthy guide, anyone can make it to the summit.

During the climbing trip, climbers will spend most nights in lodges and a few nights in tented camps. The base camp is set up at an altitude of 4,800 meters, while the high camp is set up at an altitude of 5,400 meters. Each member has an individual dome tent made in Nepal with a waterproof compact mat. The dining tent, toilet tent, and other necessary facilities are also provided.

Note: Climbing Chulu Far East Peak not only provides a rewarding adventure experience but also offers a unique cultural and nature trekking experience.

To have a successful trip, a good level of physical fitness, proper acclimatization, and well-equipped participants are required. With proper training and guidance, adventurous climbers can conquer it.
